Thanks, I enjoyed reading it. It explains some questions I had. I wish it would set the bar for other districts.

Hi mom,

This is a good description of the DPS settlement agreement if you are interested.

The Denver school district and teachers union have reached an agreement in their long-simmering dispute over teacher pay, ending a strike as it entered its fourth day. The tentative deal gives teachers significant raises and a more traditional pay system, while keeping incentives for teachers at high-poverty schools that the district believes are essential.

The tentative agreement was announced shortly after 6 a.m. Thursday, after the two sides emerged from behind closed doors after some nine hours of huddling separately. They had begun the bargaining session at 10 a.m. Wednesday.

Union members and the Denver school board still need to approve the deal, but this brings a close to the first Denver teacher strike in 25 years. With the timing of the announcement, it's unclear if all teachers will return to work Thursday. Read more
